Home Modifications

NEW Perspective:

Stay Put or Sell?

That's the question many older people ponder as they move into their 70s and beyond. Most older people settle on staying put, according to a recent survey by the Home Safety Council, a nonprofit organization dedicated to preventing home-related injuries. (From the source of the survey, you can see where this column is heading, right?)

Staying put makes economic sense. It is not only more comfortable to live out your life in your own home, it's much more affordable. The average annual fee at an assisted-living facility - a place where older people live independently but also receive a host of services like medication monitoring and meals - is $34,000.

Debra Lynn's Father

A daughter knows her father and in this case Debra Lynn's connection to her father helped restore his will to live. Bound to a skilled nursing facility rehabing after his triple hip fracture Wiley, 82, was told that he could be discharged and continue to rehab at home. However, his home was not adapted for his new level of ability and there was no way for him to get up the stairs to his bedroom and bathroom. He thought the only solution was to go stay at an extended stay hotel that offered a handicapped room. As Debra talked with her home healthcare provider, Homewatch CareGiver's, they introduced Accessible Systems as a plausible solution. "I want to continue living now", Wiley shared once his determined daughter shared her intention to make his home accessible. In the next 2 weeks stairlifts were installed and Wiley returned to his home to further his rehabilitation.

Another inspiring story influenced by a referral source, experienced by a customer and captured by Accessible Systems.

We are grateful for our referrals & clients and will be sharing stories of GREATITUDE every month in 2011!
